A View from the Bridge opens March 17th

In this gem of a play, Arthur Miller has given us a many-layered masterpiece. On the surface, this is a play about immigration, a topic that's been in our attention lately, thanks to prevailing political winds. A View from the Bridge reminds us that we have long been a nation of immigrants, and that we're not the first generation asking questions like: Who do we let in? How important is vetting and documentation? Is deportation fair?

It's one thing to answer these questions in the abstract, but Miller puts the human face on them. Strictly speaking, Marco and Rodolpho are illegal: "submarines" they're called in the play. But once Rodolpho and Catherine fall in love, we're all rooting against deportation no matter our political views.

That's because, despite the surface appearance, this is really a play about a family. What we've tried to do in this production is to peel back the layers. When you do that, you realize it's about young adults coming of age, and about the older generation figuring out how to let go of them.

As a mom whose firstborn has just flown the nest, I know that letting go is no easy task, as our protagonist Eddie Carbone soon finds out. Eddie is the kind of guy who "doesn't want to talk about it," making the transition more painful than it has to be. Once Eddie's layers are peeled back, he finds something uglier than he expected, and on that discovery hangs our tragedy.

This peeling back has inspired our design choices, allowing the actors to bring these characters to life without being weighed down by a suffocating realism. It's an acting challenge to create these characters without an abundance of furniture and props, but I think we've struck the right balance here. Kudos are due here to the terrific design team who've brought this vision to life.

By stripping the play to these bare bones, we find a story that haunts us, as it does the narrator Alfieri. Like him, we are almost compelled to watch the unraveling of these lives, and as powerless to stop it. We are captured by the vague reflections we see of ourselves, and finally we join Alfieri in mourning..."with a certain alarm."

Lynn Rollins, Scott Rollins

Scott and Lynn Rollins play Eddie and Beatrice Carbone, married couple in the show. We asked Scott Rollins what is like playing a married couple with his real-life wife, Lynn.

“What is it like playing a married couple on stage? Does actually being married help with your characters in the show?”

“The couple Lynn and I play in A View From the Bridge, Eddie & Beatrice, are much happier than we are in real life....just kidding!

We can't help but think that our relationship helps enhance our on-stage characters' personalities.

This is our 10th show together (5 pre-marriage, 5 post marriage), and we are so comfortable working together and always have each other's backs. I'm also amazed that Lynn still loves doing shows with me, because I can be a real pain!

See, we get along great! - Scott Rollins “Eddie Carbone” “
